ANALYSIS & DISTRIBUTION
BRANCH

The Embassy wishes to offer the following comments on the NIS program in response to the reference airgram:

(a) The Embassy has only limited use for NIS sections, and anticipates no special situations that would increase use of the NIS. NIS sections are most useful as briefing materials before officers leave Washington for the post. Their bulkiness, usually high classification, and relatively outdated material greatly reduce the usefulness of NIS sections once an officer has arrived at the post.

(b) NIS sections might be useful during an emergency in an adjacent area, as a means of estimating military capabilities and facilities for housing and transportation. Sections of NIS treating such matters would be useful in the event of evacuation from surrounding countries, or from this post to surrounding countries.

(c) The Embassy finds that normally more detail is available in NIS sections than can readily be used. The amount of detail reduces the usefulness of NIS sections as reference material. The summary passages likewise contribute little to ready reference, as it is selective detail rather than summary statements that is needed.

(d) The Embassy (excluding ARMA and AIRA) finds the political, economic and sociological sections more valuable than the technical sections, which are of more use to the military attachés. [REDACTED] also uses various NIS sections extensively as background or basic intelligence. Nevertheless, usefulness of even these sections is very limited as pointed out above. The Chief limiting factor is that material is dated even by the time it reaches the post in draft form. Finished (printed) political and economic sections are even more out of date, the sociological section perhaps somewhat less so. Embassy officers have used extensively publications such as the Special Warfare Area Handbook for Ethiopia (October 1960) that compare most favorably with the NIS in organization, clarity and currency of data. The Special Warfare Handbook is divided into a large low-classification section (OUO) and a small highly classified (Secret) supplement. This division greatly facilitates use of the Handbook. If less elaborately prepared NIS sections, more selective in detail and of lower and more manageable classification, can be sent to the post before the material is a year or more out of date, their usefulness to the post would be considerably enhanced. The Embassy believes, however, that NIS sections will continue to be most useful to officers as pre-arrival briefing materials to be used in Washington.

(e) The Embassy has not received Chapter I (Brief) for this or surrounding areas.

(f) The Embassy does not see any special advantages in the coordinated interdepartmental NIS program.

AIRA and ARMA point out that NIS sections are useful in determining what information is already available in Washington on this and surrounding areas. To this extent NIS sections already prepared guide collection efforts for this country and especially for surrounding countries where military attachés have responsibility. AIRA regularly uses NIS sections for primary and secondary areas of interest.
